

Narrative of an Expedition to the Shores of the Arctic Sea in 1846 and 1847: A Detailed Account of the Franklin Search Expedition Under the Command of Sir John Franklin

The Franklin Search Expedition was a British expedition led by Sir John Franklin that departed from England in 1845 in search of the Northwest Passage, a sea route connecting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. The expedition consisted of two ships, HMS Erebus and HMS Terror, and a crew of 129 men. The expedition became trapped in ice in the Canadian Arctic and all of its members perished.

The fate of the Franklin Search Expedition remained a mystery for many years. In the decades following its disappearance, numerous expeditions were launched to search for the lost ships and their crews. In 1859, the remains of HMS Erebus and HMS Terror were finally discovered in the Canadian Arctic. The ships were found frozen in ice, and the bodies of many of the crew members were found inside. The discovery of the ships and their crews provided important clues about the fate of the Franklin Search Expedition.
