In the early 1950s, Godard began making short films. He was quickly drawn to the French New Wave movement, which emphasized realism, improvisation, and a break from traditional filmmaking techniques. In 1959, Godard released his first feature film, Breathless. The film was a critical and commercial success, and it helped to establish Godard as a major figure in the New Wave movement.

Political and Experimental Work

In the 1960s, Godard became increasingly involved in politics. He made several films that explored the themes of revolution and social justice. He also began to experiment with new filmmaking techniques. In 1965, he released Alphaville, a science fiction film that was highly experimental in its form and style.

In the 1970s, Godard continued to make experimental films. He also began to explore the use of video technology. In 1972, he released Tout va bien, a film that was shot on video and that explored the themes of class struggle and worker alienation.

Later Career

In the 1980s, Godard began to return to more traditional filmmaking techniques. He released a number of critically acclaimed films, including Hail Mary (1985), Passion (1982), and Nouvelle Vague (1990). In the 1990s, Godard continued to make films, but he also began to write and publish books on film theory.
